LOCAL MERCHANT WRITES FROM OREGON

We have just received a letter from M. Meyers, our fellow townsman who is touring the west, and who is now in Portland, Oregon, after having visited the Panama Exposition. The letter is so full of good things that we acknowledge it with sufficient interest to give our readers and Mr Meyer's friends the benefit of it. It says in part:

Portlond, Oregon, May 7, 1915.
Editor Daily Independent:

Dear Sirs—As I, Meyer Meyers promised to write you about my trip, and am a man of my word, to use a slangy expression, her goes:

After leaving Monessen I made my first stop in Chicago, where I stayed for a few days taking in the sights and visiting some of the firms from which the store buys goods. From Chicago I went to Kansas City, where I stayed a week and from there to the beautiful city of Los Angeles which is one of the prettiest cities on the Pacific coast. While there I met accidentally, many old acquaintances, which made my stay there so much more interesting. The little side trips from Los Angeles to the many beaches near it, and to the Catallini Islands made it more than enjoyable.

After leaving Los Angeles, I went to the glorious litle town of San Diego, where one of the "Fairs" is held. Not only is the town quaint and charming, but the "Fair" there is one of the prettiest of its kind that I have ever seen, and I've been to all of them. I stayed a week in San Diego and from there went to the great city of San Francisco, the New York of the west. The exposition in Frisco is nothing less than superb. The buildings are huge, the illuminations at night dazzling, and all in all it seemed like a dream from which one never wants to wake up. Every day I visited the exposition grounds early in the morning and stayed until I was tired out at night.

After a week of so much dissipation I was ready to go on again, and as my son Daniel, the physician, now lives in Portland, Oregon, and as I was impatient to see him, I left San Francisco for Portland, where I am at present.

Both my son and his wife were delighted to see me and they are trying to make my stay here as pleasant as possible. They live in the section of town called Wilamette Heights, and from their home which is beautifully situated, can be seen snow capped mountains, Mt. Hood, Mt. Adams, Mt. Rainer and Mt. St. Helens. They range in order from sixty to one hundred miles from Portland but can be seen from my son's house on all clear days. It is wonderful to sit on the porch here, bask in the sun, see the roses all around you, and no matter how warm the weather, to see the snow mountains in the distance. Portland, the city of roses, is one of the most beautiful cities in the world. Not only Portland itself, but all of its surroundings, its boulevards, its parks, its rivers, the Columbia, noted for its salmon and the Wilamette, which is navigable and can be seen from the house, and last but not least its mountains. No scenery in the world can surpass the Portland scenery and no roses in the world can come up to the Portland rose The whole world knows the Portland rose.

I intend staying a few weeks longer in Portland., and on my way back will stop at Denver, Glenwood Springs, Colorado Springs. Salt Lake City, Yellowstone National park, Flint, Michigan and then home to dear old Monessen.

Hoping that this meets with your approval, I am

Sincerely Yours.
Meyer Meyers.

LITTLE BOY HORRIBLY MANGLED ON RAILROAD TRACKS

Sherwood Willard Cowher, the six years old son of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Cowher of Gibsonton, was run down and instantly killed by a P. & L. E. shifter, near the noon hour.

The child had wandered to the railroad and was playing at the time the unfortunate accident occurred. The engineer saw him along the tracks and gave several signals, but the little fellow instead of getting out of the way, ran directly in front of the approaching engine and five cars passed over the body before the train could be brought to a standstill. The mangled remains were gathered up and brought to Monessen to the undertaking rooms of W. S. Moore where they are being prepared for burial. The little form was mangled and crushed beyond recognition.

Mr. and Mrs. Cowher are well known people of Gibsonton. and their sorrow has aroused the sympathy of the whole community. Mr. Cowher is employed at the Gibsonton distillery. News of the accident was conveyed to the home as soon as it happened and Mr. Cowher came to town to make arrangements for the burial of his child, which will take place tomorrow afternoon. Services will be held at the family home at 2 o'clock. Rev. Taylor of Belle Vernon will officiate. Interment will be made in the West Newton cemetery.

Pacific Mail May Quit Because of New Law

San Francisco, May 19—The Pacific Mail Steamship company, operating nineteen vessels under the American flag, and considered one of the biggest of American steamship lines, is holding a stockholders meeting today at which it will be decided whether the line will tie up its boats and go out of business. It has been announced by the vice president of the line, R. P. Scherwin, that all sailings after Nev. 2 have been cancelled, pending the decision of the stockholders. The officials of the line claim that the new seaman's law, passed by Congress, which goes into effect on November 4, is the cause of the suggestion that future operations cease.

The Pacific Mail at present operates with Chinese crews in its trans-Pacific traffic. The officials of the line claim that the added cost of operation under the United States law would make continuance impossible. Five of the nineteen vessels of the fleet operate between San Francisco and Honolulu, Japanese and Chinese ports and Manilla.

Junior League 8A Triumphs Over the 8B

In the Junior H. S. base ball league, 8A triumphed over 8B, winning their first game and almost shattering the hopes of 8B for the pennant. The game was well played and was undecided until the last inning. Hughes pitched well, allowing nine hits and giving one base on balls, while Darning was very wild, allowing eleven bases on balls. The batting of Albrecht for 8A and Dorning and Carneh for 8B were features.

Lecture Interesting at Baptist Church

Yesterday afternoon the Rev. Dr. Wertheimer, the converted Jewish Rabbi, began the first of a series of lectures on "From Egypt to Canan." A chart is being used to illustrate the scripture lessons. The address was very instructive and interesting and gave to one a new and impressive exposition of the scriptural reference in connection with the wanderings of the children of Israel. These studies will be given every afternoon at 2:30. At the evening service the Dr. spoke on "A Good Man Lost and a Bad Man Saved." There was a good attendance which listened to his inspiring and enthusiastic message as he reviewed the different religious characteristics of the Pharisee and the Publican who went up to the temple to pray. The portrayal of the Pharisee's self righteousness and the Publican's self condemnation as they both stood in the temple and prayed was very impressive and forceful. Many references to the lives of some great men were given in exemplification that these two worshippers permeate the world of religion and profession today.

The subject for tonight will be "The Diety of Christ" and tomorrow night, "Satan." A hearty invitation is extended to all to come and hear this great Bible student and expositor.

LIGHTS WENT OFF CAR HIT THE BRIDGE

While driving his Buick car last night, William Karlowsky, son of August Karowsky, of the Monongahela House, had a slight accident which temporarily disabled his machine.

While returning from West Newton about 11:30 last night, the lights on the car failed to give proper service, causing the driver of the machine to collide with the bridge which spans the river at the above place, breaking the windshield of the car and doing other slight damage. William Eyler, one of the passengesr in the machine, was slightly cut by glass from the windshield and fortunately all the other occupants escaped injury.

Aside from Mr. Karlowsky and Mr. Eyler, Louis Depo and Miller Houseman were in the machine.

The car had to be left at West Newton and the young men driven home in a car from that place.

A Political Revolution

A revolution is about to take place in the little town of Warren, Ill. At least its new mayoress promises to "make things hum" and to effect within a short time after her assumption of office, a wholesale civic housecleaning. Mrs. A. N. Canfield, the mayoress of Warren, is 75 years old, but is possessed of all the fire and spirit of a youthful suffragist.

Heretofore, as is not unusual in cities even larger than Warren, office-holders, in that place, it is alleged, have been accustomed to take an extra forty winks in the morning, regardless of office hours, and just a trifle inclined to "go fishing" or otherwise enjoy themselves on the city's time.

But now the sales of alarm clocks promises to take a sudden jump and city officials will be seen wending their way officeward early in the morning, with a new elasticity and energy in their movements, for the dauntless woman mayor has announced: "Officers who dont earn their money are just as wicked as any other kind of a grafter, and I'm going after them good and plenty."

Pool rooms and bowling alleys also come under the condemnation of Mayoress Canfield. No longer will the youth of Warren waste its time in these places of amusement, for these it is decreed, must go.

Seriously speaking, however, if the woman mayor of Warren succeeds in her avowed intention of instituting a system of simple honesty and business efficiency in the affairs of Warren, she will have accomplished what reformers seek, and what many a larger city might profitably emulate. And whether she succeeds or not. the ideal of strict honor in public service and responsibility of public officers for the morals and welfare of the community they serve, cannot but have a beneficial influence.

A Ready Field

Not only are moving picture actors, some of whom are nonentities on the stage and others without any previous experience before they took up this work, drawing fabulous salaries, and not only are thousands of other people waxing opulent from the proceeds of moving picture shows, but the sharp demand for scenarios has opened a profitable field for writers. So great is the desire of managers for ideas and suggestions to be worked up as to photo dramas, that correct grammar, orthography and style have little weight. If a person has an idea worth while he or she can scrawl it down with pencil without regard for any laws of composition and be well paid for the trouble. In scenario contests conducted by moving picture concerns. it is expressly stated that no literary ability is required.

A young woman who was working as a stenographer in St. Louis. and had never written a line for publication before, won a prize of $10,000 for providing the last situation in a serial picture. Of course, such large rewards are not offered every day, but any suggestion that embodies an original idea can be sold.

It is small wonder that the writing of moving picture scenarios is being undertaken everywhere. Experienced playwrights have little advantage over the novice and a person who has never written anything before will find no handicap, if he has the ideas. Ninety percent. of the scenarios, except those adapted from stage plays, are said to be the work of men and women who have never written a play to be spoken. Emmet Campbell, who receives a princely salary from the Lubin company, sold 98 out of the first 100 scenarios he wrote.

WORKMEN'S LAW TO GOVERNOR

Compensation Bill Will be Signed in Near Future.

ANOTHER PARTY PLEDGE KEPT

Assurance Was Given People by the Republican Party That a Strong Act Would Go on the Books—Movement For Constitutional Convention Killed in House—Other Notes of the Closing Days of the Session.

Harrisburg, May 18.—The closing days of the Pennsylvania legislature finds the last of the big laws advocated by the Republican party on its way to the governor. It is a strong employers' liability and workmen's compensation act.

With the falling of the gavel finally this session every Republican in the

REP. THOMAS F. McNICHOL,
Who Has Been Active In Upholding Governor Brumbaugh's Bills.

Senate and House, as well as their constituents at home, may point with pride at the work accomplished since January 20. In pledge keeping achievements it has been without a precedent.

The Roney bill, submitting the question of calling a convention next January to revise the Constitution of Pennsylvania, was defeated by the house of representatives by a vote of 54 ayes to 122 nays, after a hot debate that continued for an hour.

Repesentative Charles J. Roney. of Philadelphia, sponsor of the bill, led the fight on the floor of the house for its passage.

"This is the biggest issue before this legislature, next to child labor and workmen's compensation," he declared.

He called attention to the fact that since the present constitution was adopted in 1874 many changes have been made in it.

Opponents of the mesure argued for a delay of two years in considering a new constitution. and asserted that the cost of holding a constitutional convention, $500,000, was too great to be borne by the state in its present financial condition. They urged that under the provisions of the Stern bill providing for the appointment of a commission to study the need for a revision, and to gather data and report back to the next legislature the necessity for a new constitution, there would be a delay of only two years. The Stern bill has already passed the house and is now in the senate.

Opposed to Convention.

Representative Baldwin, of Delaware, led the opposition Representative Stern, of Philadelphia, also spoke against the measure, while Representative Walters, of Franklin, spoke in favor of it.

Representative Roney, in answering the opponents of the bill, asserted that since the present constitution went into effect it had cost the state more than $1,000,000 for advertising the amendments alone.

Suffrage leaders believe that the enactment of the "woman watchers" bill, now ready for the governor's signature, will help the fight for the franchise materially. The bill provides for two woman watchers at every polling place at the November election.

"For one thing, it will give us a great opportunity to learn the practical side of what we are struggling for," said Miss Caroline Katzenstein, of the Equal Franchise society, of Philadelphia. "For another, it will help get men accustomed to seeing women at a polling place," she added.

Civil Service Bill.

The Walton bill, creating a civil service board in cities of the third class, to affect the appointment of positions to the police, engineering, electrical and fire departments, passed the senate and now goes to the governor for final action. If signed it will take effect at once. The governor will probably sign the bill without much hesitation.

The bill affects all city employes in the departments named, who have been employed continuously for two years or more. Those appointed by the present council do not come under the bill, unless previously employed in the same department.

A civil service commission is created to be composed of an educator, physician and citizen. They are to be appointed by the council and are to serve without pay. A waiting list of eligibles is to be kept and whenever a superintendent of a department has a vacancy he must notify the commission, which will submit to him the names of the three highest persons on the list. A choice must be made from these three, and this action is then subject to approval or disapproval by council. Persons employed by the city in the police, fire, electrical and engineering departments, who have seen two years' service, are exempt from examination and will hold their places during good behavior.

IV.

Strange the quips and whimsies of Chance, elusive Chance.

Years that seemed interminable, years of goading desperation, discouragement, self-sacrifice, endurance stretched behind Henry Merwin as he halted a moment at the stage door of the New York Grand Opera house to allow one of the stars to enter. A bitter smile curved his lips, lips that had tightened since the days when the milk route alone oppressed his mind, as he slowly made-up in the male dressing room for a peasant in the opening act of "Pagliacci." He was a chorus man—only a chorus man.

From below he could hear the strains of "Cavalleria Rusticana" which preceded "Pagliacci" and the voice of Cabosso, greatest of all tenors. Cabosso, who stood where the ignorant young milkman had dreamed of standing; Cabosso, the announcement of whose singing was sufficient to pack the great house.

The soul of the artist within him struggled impotently at his situation, the difference between the dream and the reality. Cabosso singing Canio, the bitter, disillusioned pantaloon, when everything that life could hold was his: and he, Henry Merwin, with a voice no less than that of the star, sang among the peasants. Unconsciously he threw himself into the role of the man, compelled to amuse the public with his antics, compelled to don grease paint when he wished to smear his face with the blood of rival and unfaithful wife. His lips opened and the tenor aria at the close of the first act poured from his throat.

He stopped abruptly as a hand fell upon his shoulder, biting his lips in mute embarrassment as he looked up into the eyes of the stage manager It dawned upon him that he was transgressing the rules of the house in singing, that in all likelihood, he would be discharged. And suddenly he was seized with a vast, overwhelming desire to hold this position that a moment before had roused all his resentment

"Are you up on the role — on Canio?" The words were crisp, brittle, mandatory.

For a moment he did not understand, then a quick flush mantled his cheeks at what he took for sarcasm. A hot answer was on the tip of his tongue, checked only in time as he read upon the faces about him that the man was really in earnest. He rose swiftly, his hand gripping at the lapel of the stage manager's coat even as the man fairly dragged him down the narrow, iron stairway toward the director, who raged about in the wings, his face the picture of misery.

He laughed ironically as his underling whispered to him, sizing the chorus-man up and down.

"Canio!" he laughed. "Substitute for Cabosso! What is your training? Who coached you?"

"Spreglia, Lamperti—"

"But who coached you in Canio?" Though his interruption was harsh, Merwin could see a light of interest in his eyes.

"De Retsky—Jean himself, coached"

'Make up—quickly," the director decided sharply

He heard nothing of the stage manager's instructions, was numbly conscious of getting into the costume of the pantaloon, heard nothing of the director's instructions as, in a cold perspiration he waited for the baritone to finish with the prologue.

Fear was upon him, cold, dank fear. Could he have run from the place, could he have put a finish to every ambition he had pressed so closely to his very soul, could he have thrust it all aside at that moment, he would have done so rather than suffer the fiery heat alternating with icy cold that seized his body, be tortured by the prickling fingers at his spine, the harsh grip at his heart.

"—— don't mind the whispering and talking while you sing. They do it with everyone but Cabosso—"

He heard no more, but these words seared themselves in letters of fire upon his brain. His teeth clicked shut with an audible sound. Suddenly all the stage fright disappeared before an anticipatory rage. They should not whisper and talk while he sang: they should treat his voice with the same respect they treated that of Cabosso. His voice was the equal of the great tenor's.

Unconscious of his audience, of the stir of curiosity at his appearance instead of the familiar Cabosso, regardless of everything save overweening desire to win, Henry Merwin hardly realized he was upon the stage before the curtain stared him in the face, the curtain which formed a barrier against the tumultuous applause of the audience at his performance, and shut him into the other world behind the scenes, the world of fellow-singers who made him realize the tremendous impression he had created.

He suddenly felt himself very weak, felt his impotence. He needed help, sympathy—he needed—Ann—

"You Want Me to Lose My Voice!"

Swiftly he discarded his costume, but illy wiping the grease paint from his countenance. But in his eyes glowed something of happiness, growing from more than fame as, half an hour later, he reread the message he had just written before passing it to the agent.

Ann Merwin, Los Angeles, Cal · Come to New York at once. No more poverty. HENRY.

V.

He waited in the library, listening to the sounds of delight from Ann's room.

In the week he had tasted the fruit of success and laughed at the fear he had entertained of it To be sought out by the great director and placed under a contract at a figure he had only vaguely dreamed of ever earning; to be the toast of town and press, to be invited into the very heart of society's most sanctified circle; to know that it was all deserved—surely they were fools who had told him the price to be paid for fame was heavy.

And now Ann was here, was so close to him he had but to tap upon the adjoining door to see her, so close to him he could hear her delighted exclamations over the gown he had bought for her to wear at Mrs. Van Rolphe's reception that very night.

Slowly a frown crossed his forehead, a perplexed and anxious frown. Ann—would Ann be able to live up to the position he had created for her?

A little cry from the doorway, and he clasped her to his heart, fiercely, for the doubt that had been his. But, as he held her away from him, he was filled with the bitter realization that the doubt remained.

Pretty, fresh, wholesome—yet she was obviously uncomfortable in her finery. There was something of the out-of-doors about her that did not seem to fit into the new life. He felt himself guiltily contrasting her with the dark, exotic beauty of Olga Drake, the woman who had made so much of him at a reception of the day before, the woman who had seemed so desirous of being with him alone, despite the gallants besieging her And Olga Drake, mistress of wealth and beauty, was not less famous as a social dictator that he was as a singer.

In the carriage he could not drive that contrast from his preoccupied mind. He felt himself already a bit irritated at the insistence of Ann that the tiny cottage, the humble little home in Los Angeles should not be sold, that not a stick of the furniture be changed

He flushed hotly as she stumbled upon her train as they made their entrance at the Van Rolphes', angry with himself for the impulse which made him seek out the eyes of Olga Drake to find whether she had noticed the slip, more angry to know that he had smiled with her at his wife's mishap. Ann was his wife, the woman he loved, and no one had the right to smile at her.

He turned toward her, assisting her to their hostess, bracing his shoulders against the gibes he knew her manner occasioned, with a smile upon his lips And then the guilty feeling came upon him that he was feeling the martyr, that he was taking pride in his attitude of suffering

In the mortification of the moment he found himself offering his arm to Olga Drake, passing his wife without a glance.

"I'm afraid we frightened your poor wife," Miss Drake murmured in his ear.

He looked furtively at Olga Drake at the note of sympathy in her voice. And yet he merely smiled and sought out his wife with his eyes, dropping them more swiftly as they met the mute appeal in Ann's own eyes. He was conscious of chattering volubly about nothing in particular, was aware that his face was burning.

A farmer's daughter he had married. A milkman's wife he had made her. And, equally indifferent to aught she was one still.

VI.

He paced the library floor nervously, every nerve in his body jangling discordantly at the chatter of his wife in the next room, the confusion of her undignified romping with the baby. Only the night before he had given a wretched performance, his voice turning hoarse. Only the night before he had tiffed with Olga Drake, for the first time in all the months during which their intimacy had grown to such an extent, that there were whispers about it.

First, he had tried to break away from the spell she cast upon him But his work threw him with her set and his wife used every subterfuge to avoid accompanying him to any affair which might aid him in the social world, always pleading to be allowed to remain with the baby.

And now she was late. He looked at his watch nervously then whirled to the stairs and tapped upon her door.

"I forgot again, Henry," she replied, before he had a chance to say a word "Please forgive me, but—but I don't think I help you with these people—"

"You make no effort to improve yourself. You are constantly doing everything you can to annoy me. You are ruining my voice, clouding my whole career.

"And you don't try to do better. You don't care for anything but the vile little hole in Los Angeles You want me to be ruined. You want me to lose my voice. You know you do—you want a milkman because you are nothing and never will be anything but fit for a milkman's wife."

"But what can I do, Henry? What do you want me to do?"

"Do?" He laughed, laughed in her face "Why, get a divorce, of course. I'm through. Get it before I'm completely ruined. I'll give you the divorce—there'll be no trouble about that—and fifty thousand dollars."

She regarded him steadily, searchingly.

"No, there'll be no trouble—about that," she repeated after him, as he slammed the door. "No trouble, Henry."

VII.

Merwin felt a curious elation upon him, a sudden lightness of heart, one of those miraculous sensations of utter delight that come at the most unexpected moments when one is performing one's work a little better than ever it has been performed before.

Arrogant with the delightful arrogance of the artist who has worked hard for achievement his eyes sought those of Olga Drake in her box at the head of the diamond horseshoe. That very day Ann had been granted her interlocutory decree of divorce; that very day a sensational newspaper had whispered the name of Miss Drake in connection with it; that very day he had boasted to her that he would make amends for that; and now—now, in the first performance of the widely heralded new opera, he was singing as he had never sung before

Clear, ringing, sweet toned as any bell, holding the audience spellbound, with eyes aglow the voice of Merwin rang out And then the song died in mid-air, seemed to halt upon its course. The singer's hand clutched at his throat, clutched desperately there as though by sheer brute strength he would force out the sounds that the vocal chords refused to give. His lips opened and closed, closed and opened. A mute he stood there, a ludicrous mute, sawing the air with his hands, desperately, wildly—

A laugh hurtled from the gallery, the laugh that was sufficient to guide the mob. It grew in volume, grew so that its sound penetrated the heavy curtain as it slowly descended upon a wild eyed, sobbing tenor, who glared piteously at the back of a laughing woman in the box at the head of the diamond horseshoe.

With the ready effervescent sympathy of the Romance people the director pillowed the head of his great "find" upon his shoulder. But over that head his eyes sought those of Doctor Holbrook, the world's renowned throat specialist, who had been treating Merwin now for months And a hard expression, a look of flint was in the director's eyes as the specialist shook his head to indicate the death of another voice.

"It is the fault of the atmosphere, the early training," coolly declared the impresario later that evening to the reporters "Now, Merwin, with the proper, early training would have proved the greatest tenor of our time." He shrugged a bit contemptuously. "You call it here, I believe, a flash in the pan."

VIII.

Ann Merwin's hands still gripped tightly the newspaper with which she had fled from her attorney's office, the newspaper whose startling head had caught her eye even as her hand received the final decree of divorce. There was a wild expression in her eyes as she lunged through the crowded traffic of the streets toward the city hospital where the story said Henry had been taken.

Forgotten the document in her handbag, forgotten the bitterness with which he had treated her. She only remembered that he was the father of her child, that he was the man she had loved—the man she loved still

Voiceless, forsaken by friends, an object of pity and contempt, a vagrant succumbing to exposure at the dark waterside where he might have contemplated making his final resting place—he was still her husband just as he always had been

She did not heed the curious glances of the nurses nor the internes as she demanded admittance to his bedside. That the story of the celebrity's downfall, the divorce and attendant scandal belonged to the world meant nothing to her. A queen—she demanded the right to be with her husband in his hour of need

She did not shrink away from the poor creatures upon the cots in the wards through which they passed. The flotsam and jetsam of a great city was there, but that mattered nothing to her That her husband was just such another dependent upon a city's charity meant nothing to her.

She felt a little pain in her heart as the interne paused beside a snowy cot, hesitated a second before approaching the delirious man, tossing and tumbling upon the cot, then bravely moved forward again. The interne rested his hand upon her arm. She looked into his face with surprise and saw nothing but sympathy there and desire to avoid harm coming to her. She brushed him aside and then a voice reached out to her, a voice wild and hoarse, throbbing with the insanity of delirium yet with the longing of a world in it, a voice she would have known from all the voices of the world

"Olga—Olga—Olga—"

On and on and on, interminably, and always with that same piteous appeal, that same throbbing note of heart-rending helplessness cried the voice; the voice of Henry Merwin, her husband toward the woman, the laughing woman's back, the Olga Drake who sat in the head box of the diamond horseshoe.

She held her head proudly, defiantly as the superintendent of the hospital tried to suppress the pity in his look with which he accepted the money she had placed upon his desk, when she fled from that ward, fled from that voice.

"When he is well," she said quietly, "give him this money. Say it is from a—a friend."

"But—"

"From—a—friend," she repeated softly a faint smile upon her lips.

She rose suddenly for the scent of roses was in her nostrils, the vision of far-flung hills in her eyes, with a tiny white cottage nestling at the foot of them.

"Perhaps he may go back," she murmured to herself, as she left the place. "Perhaps he may go back—home—and be glad—glad the home didn't go when everything else was paid—paid. Who Pays?"

Story of a Seeress.

Grant Duff in his diary tells a curious story of a "seeress." Mlle. Lenormand was consulted by Robespierre and Napoleon I. Grant Duff's father had a strange experience with Mlle Lenormand. He and a friend went to consult her, and after she had told him what he wanted to know she tried with the friend, but became confused, said her heart failed her and begged him to leave the house. He persuaded her to try again, and again the same result followed. Then, declaring that this had never happened to her before, she lost all patience and implored him to leave instantly. He did so and as he passed out of her door was knocked down and killed by a heavy wagon.

Forks.

Neither the Greeks nor the Romans possessed forks. It was, according to that curious book of travels, "Coryat's Crudities," published in 1611, left to Italy to invent them, because, as the author quaintly observes, "the Italian cannot by any means endure to have his dish touched with hands, seeing that all men's fingers are not alike clean."

A Serious Conclusion.

"Is your daughter still taking music lessons?"

"No," replied Mr. Growcher. "After hearing her sing and play lately I have concluded that she doesn't need a teacher any more. What she wants is a censor."—Washington Star.

FIVE REASONS WHY ONE MAN BELIEVES IN WOMAN SUFFRAGE

Norman Hapgood, the editor of Harper's Weekly, is a firm believer in woman suffrage. He has drawn up a list of five reasons why he believes in it and has published them in the following statement:

"I think woman suffrage a very important reform to bring about for many reasons, of which the following are, perhaps, the most important:

"1. It is impossible to carry out frankly and honestly the principles of democracy when half the race is arbitrarily excluded from power.

"2. Women are more interested than men in a number of aspects of life that particularly require attention from legislatures, courts and voters.

"3. Laboring men have gained a great deal from the vote in specific advantages, and the same thing would be true of the women.

"4. Women who belong to the leisure and semi-leisure class would have their thoughts turned into channels more profitable to themselves as well as to the community.

"5. Since steam and machinery took charge of industry, the interests of the old fashioned home have been carried into the factory and the community, and those interests which have always been looked upon as special to women are no longer concentrated in the household, but have become the leading public problems of the time."

ONE IN EVERY FIVE

One woman in every five in the United States already has the right to vote for President.

Will you add the women of Pennsylvania to this number in November?

Votes for Teachers!

If the suffrage amendment is approved by the voters this fall it will enfranchise 90 percent of the 40,000 teachers of the State. The women teachers, who do nine-tenths of the training for citizenship, will then be enabled through their own experience in practical public affairs to give the next generation of voters a thorough training in State government.

All sensible people agree that two heads are better than one when it comes to solving public problems, but the man who votes as the ward leader tells him doesn't see why that is any reason for women having the vote.
